How does the portfolio establish the designer's personal brand?	Personal logo, with a purple gray color scheme.	Personal logo, a very clean color scheme, and basic personal details in the footer.	Personal logo along with a relatively strong focus on building and sketching.	Portfolio 1 stood out for its unique color scheme and spacious feeling (from wide side margins).
Is the navigation simple and intuitive?	Very clear nav headings, although drop down for projects is unclear, and a link to navigate a little down the page seems unnecessarily complicated.	Navigation headings are simple, although Info could be renamed to About to better represent the content.	Not super intuitive as a side nav bar, with lower-case and small characters, is relatively uncommon, and navigating the Sketchbook requires endless scrolling down (would be nice if there was a toc).	Portfolio 2 stood out for its simplicity and the minimal number of nav items.
Does the portfolio website go beyond the template?	It's nice to see a separation between case study, design challenge, and illustrations. Also the addition of organisations they've worked with provides	Includes a short timeline of their work history and what they are doing currently. Also, early student work shows breadth.	It goes beyond a typical UX portfolio to include woodworking along with sketching and illustrations.	Portfolio 1 stood out for its inclusion of organisations they've worked with along with their illustrations,

Does the portfolio website include a diversity of projects?	Yes, there are end-to-end projects, design challenges, and visuals.	Yes, there are printmaking, logo design, and visual design. Still, there seems to be a problem with trying to click inside the projects, as many of the pages are displaying coming soon.	Definitely, from woodworking to sketching and internships and illustrations.	Portfolio 3 stood out for its diversity of projects and the design process for all projects were comprehensively documented.
Is the site housing the portfolio responsive?	Not completely. The site is unresponsive for split screens and scrolling horizontal is required. Also no images are displayed on mobile.	Yes, on a larger device, there are 3 projects per row. But on smaller devices there are 2 or 1 project per row.	The main home page has a slight problem, as the page is unable to fit entirely in the screen and scrolling is required.	Portfolio 2 stood out for its simple yet completely responsive design.

Summarize your thoughts for the questions below

Was there an element of the portfolio that you would like to learn more about?

- For portfolio 1, I would like to know more about how they created the button (and its animation) for scrolling down.
- For portfolio 2, I would like to know why they chose the lock icon to convey that the page is coming soon.
- For portfolio 3, I would love to learn about the decision behind incorporating a side nav bar instead of a horizontal one.

Did you discover any design element that you would like to include on your own portfolio website?

- I would like to include a coming soon for projects that have not started or are in the initiation phase. But I would use this in a moderate amount.
- I would also like to bring in more of my brand color palette to the site, as Portfolio 1 did.
- I would like to list organisations I've worked with or contributed to for a fast high level overview for employers.
- And finally, a diversity of projects (not just in UX) but in other areas like woodworking or illustrations, would give a more complete feeling. For me, I would include programming projects and logo design projects.
